People at greatest risk of developing complications with flu are the elderly, people suffering from chronic illness such as heart or lung disease and anyone whose immune system is depressed, such as AIDS patients, or recent chemotherapy patients. Outbreaks of flu are caused by mutating strains of three basic types of influenza viruses and often occur as an epidemic. The viruses are caught and passed on in the same way as cold viruses.

Type A viruses are usually the most potent and are most often responsible for epidemics. The B type viruses are less severe, and type C viruses are responsible for the mildest cases of the flu that are most like a common cold. For people most at risk of complications the flu vaccine is an option.
