When the disease is rare or genetic, information is hard to find and even harder to understand. Patients and their loved ones may waste hours sorting through outdated, unreliable information before finding anything useful. To help in these situations, the National Institutes of Health has established the Genetic and Rare Diseases Information Center GARD.

Funded by the NIHs National Human Genome Research Institute and the Office of Rare Diseases, the Center is staffed by information specialists, many of whom have experience in genetic counseling. Theyve provided up-to-date and accurate, personalized information about almost 4,000 genetic and rare diseases.
