All the kids in my neighborhood had bikes, of course they were two speed bikes, unlike the many different bikes that are available now. I don't remember any of my friends being overweight back then. We rode bikes rather than watching some silly or violent program on TV.

In fact, there was no TV, no McDonalds, no computers, no Gameboys; the only video games we had were pictures in our heads. During the daylight hours we didn't have many sedentary games. We ran around in the yards playing imaginary games. It was great fun. At night the whole family would sit around the supper table eating and talking. The meal usually consisted of a meat, two or three vegetables, and dessert with tea or milk to drink. No one opted for bottled water, oh yeah, there was no bottled water.

The only time we had hamburgers was on Saturday nights, no fries. Instead of fries we had goulash. During the summer we cooked outdoors on a homemade barbecue pit made out of stone. There were no charcoal, electric, or gas grills, we used wood in the pit. Some of the neighborhood kids were always invited to eat supper with us on Saturday night.

We would eat on a wooden picnic table in the backyard. After supper we would play basketball or horseshoes, or some other game. We got plenty of exercise. Maybe if we had done some type of things, we would not have so many lazy and overweight people now.

Get some "kids" of all ages together and go for a bike ride at least once a week. When you are riding, maybe along the way you'll ride upon a backyard barbecue pit where you can fix some burgers the old fashion way and pitch a few horseshoes after supper.
